BALLINGER DROPS MASK; ATTACKS CONSERVATION

In Denver Speech He Takes a Stand Against Federal Control of Forests and Public Lands and Attacks Bureau Chiefs Who Uncovered Things in His Department—He Wants Alaska to Be Exploited by Individuals

Denver, Colo., Sept. 28.—Denouncing what he termed a tendency toward "bureaucratic government in America," and declaring that certain reformers were introducing doctrines which are "the antithesis of reform," Richard A. Ballinger, former secretary of the interior, in addressing the public lands convention today, took occasion to reply to a recent address at Seattle, Wash., of secretary of the interior Walter L. Fisher.

"Is it progress to give unbridled power to bureaucrats?" asked Mr. Ballinger. "There is a set of people in this, as there is in every country, who want the government to do everything for them, because they are either too indolent or incompetent to do for themselves," he continued.

"This is the essence of socialism. Therefore, every tendency toward the alteration of our constitutional system, which encourages paternalism, is destructive of the essential principles of republican institutions. The bureaucratic theory of government, is destructive of our representative system."

"The Bureaucratic Plot." Subordination as well as efficiency demands that bureau chiefs not through the head of the department to which they were assigned. They are the servants of the department, and the departments are of the executive. Executive discipline in the early days of the government tolerated no semblance of insubordination. So long as the federal bureau retained its subordinate character it performed a necessary and wholesome function.

"By the laxity of this discipline, by the encouragement of congress to ambitious bureau chiefs and through the itching for notoriety, the bureaucratic idea of government secured a foothold. The bureaucratic idea is founded on the assumption that the bureau head, or chief, is better fitted to handle the affairs of the people than they are themselves."

"The public is always ready to impute superior ability to executive officers, in whose election they have no part, rather than to their own representatives. It may be an easy way for the people to repudiate their own civil inability by the selection of qualified representatives by abandoning representation for bureaucracy, but there seems to be no logical connection between this view and the doctrine of initiative, referendum, recall and other popular panaceas.

Charges "Sell-Out" Scheme.

"The extent to which bureaucratic ambition may be carried can perhaps be illustrated best by the scheme, at one time seriously considered by certain bureau heads, to dismember the interior department by taking from it all those bureaus that had anything to do with the public domain and, together with the forestry bureau, concentrate them in another department, where their combined strength could be utilized to promote the propaganda designed to operate the public domain as a national estate for the conservation of certain bureau chiefs. The interior department was to be left with the patent office, the pension office and the eleventh bureau. Institutions. Even the national parks were to be taken from it and parceled by mass in green uniforms, the grazing lands were to be leased to the influential and more powerful stockmen; the forests held or disposed of in conjunction with the timber barons; the mineral lands mined on lease or royalty to those who contributed their support to this politico-bureaucratic combination, and the water powers and rights of way distributed on a permit basis, so as to hold the permittee as a vassal to the service. Finally, agricultural lands, at least in reserves, were to be held on equally subservient and perilous tenure.

"No country, except Russia, which adheres to the bureau idea, has undertaken to treat the forests as national property, cited as a guide in forestry, does not adhere to the national forest idea. Her forests are held and managed by and the revenue turned into the treasury; there are no imperial forests."

Knows the Public Knows.

"I am not unmindful that any such suggestion will be met with a tirade of abuse from those who are interested in promoting the bureaucratic idea of national conservation, and the individual who has the temerity to make the suggestion will at once be heralded as the agent of the interests; possibly of the Guggenheims, as they have been made the convenient target for all such assaults, and the suggestion will probably be attacked on the ground that the states have failed to show a proper appreciation and ability to handle their own public lands.

"The very isolation of Alaska and her inhospitable climate should move the government to give her greater freedom of development in respect to her natural resources. She should least of all territories be burdened with bureaucracy. Government operation of her railways, her mines and her other resources means continued decimation of her population and the withholding of capital for investment in any part of that region."

His Reply to Fisher.

Here Mr. Ballinger made what was regarded as a reply to Mr. Fisher. "The reformer says the hands of the clock never turn backward, but is he always sure the reforms he advocates are not the renewal of discarded doctrines which were in their day the antithesis of reform? Are we progressing when we advocate the doctrine of federal oppression against which every line of the constitution cries out? Is it progress or the advancement of popular rights to give unbridled power to bureaucrats? Not it is going back to the evils we struggled to emancipate ourselves from."

Again, is it progress and sound reform to say we will no longer tolerate the system which gave a free simple title to the industrious and courageous prospector and settler in the public lands; a system which has made the great mass of our people home builders and the builders of new commonwealths stored with wealth and civic progress unrivaled in all the range of human endeavor?"

MILLS BUILDING

EXPECTED SATURDAY WITH HOTEL PLANS

Work May Begin as Soon as the Site Is Cleared

Ralph Taylor, vice president of the William Miller Sons company, which has the contract to erect the new Paso Del Norte hotel, is expected to arrive here Saturday with the plans for the big hotel.

Work on the new structure will then begin as soon as the site is cleared. The old Kohberg building has been wrecked to the first story and will be out of the way of the grading contractors next week.
